soup, soda, and lemonade to serve their patrons. Such beverages are typically made by blending several different
components
together, including
various flavored

syrups. These syrups may include sweeteners, extracts, and acids. When the beverage is then ready for use, the components are manually measured, mixed together, and the beverage dispensed. The beverage is sometimes poured into a cup. There are several disadvantages to the traditional system. It can be time consuming for the barista, who mixes the components on the counter and then pours the beverage into a cup. If someone is waiting to use the beverage, he/she has to wait for the barista to finish mixing the beverage and to pour the beverage into a cup. Further, the cup is then emptied and may be refilled, requiring another pour of the beverage. The traditional system can also be inefficient, since the components are manually measured, mixed, and then poured into a cup. Thus, each cup of beverage requires a certain amount of manual labor. In addition to the time, labor, and coffee consumption issues, traditional beverage making is also a messy

---

---

---

---

---

---

process. For example, the components are mixed on the counter and then the beverage is poured into a cup. If the cup is not emptied properly, the residual

---

beverage and/or the beverage
making equipment
can be spilt.

Moreover, spills are a common occurrence. As a result, the counter
and coffee mugs are not clean. The

counter can be annoying to clean. It can also be an impediment to serving beverages. If the counter is large, as is often required in fast-food restaurants, there may not be

---

room to spread out
or place an adequate number of coffee mugs for use by the patrons.
