Jim, Two points on the cost of covering the ICE book or any other third party ETS book. 1. I would not be comfortable with having a third party producing cost reports. 2. I would be in favor of a broader research group producing the cost reports for all commodity groups. I feel that we need to have a very comprehensive set of cost reporting tools across all commodity groups. A broader view is also preferable from an accountability perspective. Let me know what you think. JoeThis article is from the archive of our partner. To be fair, everywhere from Flint, Mich., to New Orleans there are signs that local officials are concerned about lead in children's blood. They've all grappled with the question of how to handle the crisis, without coming to a definitive answer. Which of these state and local plans is best? (Maura Keating argues that these problems require a Federal response.) The Government Accountability Office says not to take too much notice of the individual plans, but that the individual plans aren't that important. (We'll have another round of plans to look at soon.) Continue below for a quick tour of the plans and the websites, along with links to follow-up reporting on each. The voluntary nationwide drinking water testing system. The United States Government has offered to pay states to establish a voluntary monitoring program to measure lead levels in the nation's drinking water. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the cost will be $5.6 million this year. Not only does the program not address the most pressing problem of water lead concentrations, but it won't even be fully functional for another year. As The Verge points out, the provision is so technically difficult to implement that the House passed a bill to delay the program for another year. Meanwhile, the program's last bits of money have already been spent. States that decide to participate in the program will be required to create their own systems to monitor and test for lead. President Obama has promised to sign the bill that funds the voluntary program, but he hasn't yet taken action. Meanwhile, as NAM argues, families will still face the same corrosion problems. The New Orleans plan. New Orleans has used three different levels of lead filters since the 1970s in an effort to reduce lead exposure in drinking water. It was the
