Effect of exercise and heat on blood flow distribution in the perfused hind limb of the cat. The effect of exercise and heat on blood flow distribution in the perfused hind limb of the cat was studied by means of radioactive microspheres. Animals were exposed to air or to an environmental heat stress of about 30 degrees C. Exercise consisted of treadmill running at a speed corresponding to 55% of maximal oxygen uptake. Blood flow was measured after supramaximal isometric exercise at different submaximal loads. Three groups were studied: in one the increase in the arterial pressure was prevented by pretreatment with 1.0 mg/kg phentolamine (intravenous injection). In a second group of cats the increased resistance in the renal vascular bed was compensated by a reduction in the perfusion pressure (SP, pre-nephrectomy = 90 cmH₂O). In a third group of cats, the SP was fixed by a small prostatic nephrectomy. All three groups were then placed in a thermal chamber at ambient air temperature and submitted to an environmental heat stress of 30 degrees C. This procedure caused a decrease in the local vascular resistances in muscle, skin, and the various organs, a decrease in the skin temperature, and a rise in the skin blood flow. The spleen became the only organ which showed an increase in blood flow. In the other two groups of animals, the results were similar to those obtained in the thermal chamber, but the absolute values for the skin, muscle, and organ blood flows were decreased. The results show that even in the perfused limb, there is a redistribution of blood flow after exercise and heat stress. This was mainly due to an increase in blood flow to the skin. It is concluded that central mechanisms regulating blood flow in peripheral tissue, such as the sympathetic nervous system, the circulating catecholamines, and the thermogenic system, are not involved in the redistribution. Nações Unidas Luz project Project Details The Luz project is UNICEF's flagship program to end the injustice of child labour. Since the first six months of the 13-month pilot project, the primary objective has been to distribute t-shirts. Each t-shirt will be sewn by hand by a young girl less than 15 years of age. These t-shirts mean the world to the families. By the end of the project we will distribute 892,500 t-shirts to vulnerable children in Luanda, the capital city of Angola So far, there are 240,000 t-shirts for our Ugandan beneficiaries and we are aiming at distributing 300,000 t-shirts to vulnerable children across all communities in the Mango-Lumampa- Makhado region in Luanda. In order to continue with the project in Luanda, we would need to raise funding for approximately 140,000 t-shirts for the children in Luanda. Each t-shirt has a price tag of $5.40 and by providing the funding in the form of pledges we can help ensure that these vulnerable children in Luanda receive the t-shirts needed for their important and uncertain future. Many children in several of the vulnerable communities are not registered with the Ministry
