In 2012, Dr. Sarah Laurie, a Ph.D. in anatomy at the College of Veterinary Medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, made headlines for an astonishing discovery: She found that lions, wolves and dogs share a remarkable proportion of genes with each other, which means they actually share a common ancestor. In other words, this gene-sharing supports the hypothesis that dogs are really wolves, and that they didn't separate until about 8,000 years ago. The reason this is such a big deal is that, according to conventional thinking, the Old World carnivores—that is, wolves, lions, cats, dogs and others—evolved in Africa around 40 million years ago. So if they started evolving independently, according to their own unique evolutionary paths, then you'd expect to see some genetic similarity to these lineages. But there was none. What Dr. Laurie found was that the Old World lineages have actually been sharing genes all along. Ever since her discovery in 2012, things have been looking up for canines. Last year, researchers reported that there are five subgroups of dogs, which they named "dog-like" because they have genetic cousins outside of the domestic dog: the gray wolf, the spotted hyena and the pangolin. Further research from Dr. Laurie has confirmed that if you toss in the Komodo dragon and the Steller sea lion, then the number of lineages goes up to seven. Now, for the first time, scientists at Duke University, led by a team from the University of California, Davis, have used a similar method to show that there are actually 19 distinct lineages of early dogs—and no wolves at all. They report their results in the journal Proceedings of the Royal Society B. The ancestors
