Joey Garrison USA TODAY NETWORK-Tennessee Nashville's Sunken Garden is an outdoor secret. It's a pre-Victorian park literally located underneath Lower Broadway. Once you experience it, you can't unsee it. There are no real signs, no plaques or tours. You have to know the place exists to find it. Last week, the Tennessee Historical Commission designated the park a National Historic Landmark. In 1913, Helen Wilfong created the garden. Although Sunken Garden was built during the same period that fashion made its debut, it's not as impressive as a designer dress. While the fashion of the time was full of silk, lace and ostrich feathers, Sunken Garden was a pioneer in the days of the Victorian garden. More than 2,000 people have visited the park since it opened to the public in 1974. Many more have walked beneath it. If you're looking for long-lasting memories, Sunken Garden is the place to go. ► More: Sunken Garden photography contest The garden is a wooded oasis within a city of concrete. Remember the days when downtown was filled with shade trees? These are those trees. Wilfong's architect, Oscar Wenderoth, designed the sprawling Victorian gardens in the late 1880s. He brought over plants and laborers from Europe. The garden is an English garden. It's a sloping hill of greenery dotted with fountains and water features. Flowers bloom in the spring and summer. Trees grow in the fall. More: Sunken Garden's back lot: Here are some of the shot you've never seen Sunken Garden is an outdoor secret.
